An Idea Keeps Growing In Britain

Morning-after thoughts in Britain when an election is over are sober and thoughtful, like post-election thoughts here. The happy victors are awed by the responsibility they have taken on themselves by winning. The losers are philosophic and grumpy. "Wait till the next time." they mutter.

There now is extra significance in the nexttime prospect in British politics. If the thoughtful Conservatives are right in one of their conclusions, the philosophical Labor-

Prime Minister Macmillan believes the Labor party lost ground in last weeks' election because Britons are losing class consciousness in politics.

He thinks this year's show of strength by Britain's third party - the Liberals was evidence that the Labor party is sharing its traditional voters with the more moderate

When statisticians have had time to analyze the British vote, they may learn that the pickup in Liberal votes, though not enough to change the total of Liberal members in Parliament, was enough to help the Labor party lose 28 seats to Conservatives.

The vote breakdown, when it is completed, will be studied with lively interest by U.S. politicians for what it may reveal about 1960

It never has been proved convincingly that the labor movement in the United States can deliver the votes of its members in an

It never has been demonstrated beyond the possibility of doubt that the element of class consciousness here could be used against one party for the benefit of the opposition.

Least of all has it been made clear that leaders of the U.S. labor movement who put all their political eggs in the Democratic basket knew what they were doing and made no mistake. Nor has it been made any clearer that the Democrats who encouraged them to do it were gifted with long-term foresight.

If political class-consciousness were to become as limp here as it became in Britain last Thursday when the polls opened, an idea that keeps growing in British political circles would put down American roots in a hurry. It's the idea that the best thing for all the people all the time is moderation; that nothing wears out more quickly than the extremism of reformers who want to chuck what is so they can experiment with what they wish could be.

Uncovering Some Obvious Dirt

A report from Ohio's superintendent of purchases points up one of the immediate benefits of Gov. DiSalle's current series of surprise inspection visits to state mental hos-

The purchaser says he is being flooded with requests from the institutions for cleaning materials - detergents, soaps, disinfectants. He adds that the requests are becoming something of a headache because it is not easy to find what the hospitals want in the quantity they want on short notice.

There has been so much talk about the long-range, deep-rooted, expensive problems of improving conditions in our mental institutions that "the little things" are often

Gov. DiSalle is aware of the overwhelming rists and other specialized personnel, the lack of adequate space to handle the increasing load, the burden of custodial care for those who cannot be treated or cured, the need for modern equipment, the lack of enough money to wipe out all those problems at once.

But he also has maintained since he first saw the report on the survey of needs by Jav W. Collins that there are things to be done right now, with the money at hand, that will have immeasurable effect on the health and morale of the thousands of people seeking help in mental hospitals.

One is simply cleanliness. The chief executive has been appalled at the dirt he has found as permanently installed in the institutions as some of their patients. At Apple Creek Hospital, for example where he found conditions comparatively good, he remarked that the kitchen just needed more ordinary, day-to-day housekeeping.

Probably part of the problem is that cleanliness is one of those conditions we take so much for granted, especially in hospitals, that constitute one of the big shortcomings of our vast system of mental institutions.

How incredible - even disgraceful - that It took surprise visits by the governor of the

Deceit On The Airwaves

It is possible Congress might pass a law forbidding deceit on the airwaves. But it isn't a good bet

Congressmen are not always noted for their sense of fairness. But most of them have

A law forbidding deceit on the airwaves and prescribing penalties for practicing deceit would have to be drawn with great skill to keep congressmen from getting caught n their own bear trap.

Deceit could be construed to mean "an attempt to deceive," exactly as the dictionary defines it. If a congressman so much as wore a blue shirt in a TV appearance (because blue looks white and white looks gray)

he would be attempting to deceive. If he read his speech off cards instead of giving it off the cuff, as many speakers do, he could be accused of an attempt to deceive. If he brightened up his record a little, he would be in line for indictment.

It is not a good bet that Congress will install teeth that sharp in the regulations by which government reminds airwave licensees they are responsible to a higher authority than sponsors; that there is some aim in television higher than getting a high rating at any expense.

What, then, in the absence of congressional enactment could make impossible a recurrence, perhaps even a continuation, of the rigging of quiz shows?

This looks more and more like one of the times when the public must protect itself by developing its own discernments and following the obverse side of the Golden Rule: Do not let others do unto you what you would not do to them

The Once Over

Combining entertainment, drama, crime and whodunit routines, the House committee probe of quiz shows was so exciting it should he offered for movie rights. Testimony that crookedness was featured as an airwave 'spectacular" has jarred the public

If charges are true, it's easy to understand why some quiz shows appeared between private-eye programs.

But bad as quiz show operators are paint ed, a fair question is: "How about contestants who, when propositioned on a nefarious idea, said, "Okay, let's go," instead of 'Pardon me while I see the district attorney'?'

Q. Who was the author of "The show must go on," and why, after getting the script in advance, weren't you honest enough to shout, "Not with my help, Buster"?

Television, itself, has had a setback, not just some of its shows.

The networks, themselves, will have to worry about rebuilding the confidence of millions of people who, once bitten, now will be President Eisenhower sees swift and cheap production in other lands engulfing us and threatening the United States with the loss of its industrial leadership. Without that leadership, he believes we will lose the horse race Chairman Khrushchev has been promoting.

This accounts for the President's utterly uncharacteristic intervention in the steel strike crisis.

Take a Wilk Break Three Times a Day

MILK helps you relax. Lots of everyday experiences can put your nerves on edge. Yet everyone thinks, works and plays better when relaxed. The vitamins in fresh, delicious milk help you relax — make you feel good. That's why a milk break three times a day is such a good idea. A glass of milk in mid-morning, mid-afternoon and before bedtime gives you a more relaxed feeling, eases tension.
